A PASTORAL RESOURCE
A PASTORAL RELATIONSHIP RESOURCE

Making an Apology

Taking Responsibility, Beginning Repair, and Remaining Within Grace

BY LORNE BOSTWICK

Making an Apology

Taking Responsibility, Beginning Repair, and Remaining Within Grace

A Pastoral Relationship Resource

An apology can be a small sentence carrying enormous weight.

You know something went wrong. Perhaps you spoke sharply, dismissed a concern, acted without consultation, or failed to follow through. You want to make it right. Yet naming the mistake may awaken something much larger: shame, fear, defensiveness, or the conviction that a capable pastor would never have done such a thing.

Some of us grew up where mistakes were denied, punished, or remembered indefinitely. We learned to explain ourselves quickly, shift responsibility, or become so ashamed that we could no longer respond constructively.

Knowing the theology of confession does not always give us words when we need to apologize.

This resource offers a place to find those words—and the actions that can give them substance.

It concerns ordinary failures in pastoral leadership and personal communication. Abuse, exploitation, threats to safety, serious misconduct, and other circumstances requiring formal intervention need appropriate safeguarding and accountability processes. An apology may belong within those processes, but it cannot replace them.

The question here is more immediate:

How can I tell the truth about what happened, begin appropriate repair, and remain grounded enough to participate in a renewed relationship?

Four movements follow: remain within grace, name what is yours, begin repair, and share the work of reconciliation. These are not four weeks to complete before apologizing. Move promptly where responsibility is clear. Return to these pages when you need support.

Movement One: Remain Within Grace

Your Mistake Is Not Your Name

Christian confession begins within grace.

Your worth does not depend on flawless performance. You belong to God before you explain yourself, before you recover your confidence, and before another person decides how to respond.

That belonging does not make your conduct unimportant. It makes truthful responsibility possible.

Psalm 51 gives language to a person who can no longer evade what he has done. First John 1:8–9 places acknowledgment of sin alongside the promise of God's forgiveness. Neither invites us to treat harm as insignificant. Neither makes failure the whole truth about a person.

The Reformed tradition holds together truths we often separate: we are capable of good, capable of harm, dependent on grace, and called to repentance. We do not earn our worth through a successful apology. Nor does grace excuse us from making one.

Confession names what happened. Repentance turns toward a different way of living. Repair gives that turning a practical form.

You can own a failure without becoming that failure.

You can accept consequences without concluding that your vocation has been permanently discredited.

You can ask for forgiveness without demanding it, and begin repair without controlling its outcome.

Grace does not release you from responsibility. It releases you from the need to make responsibility a verdict against your worth.

Pause with that distinction.

When you imagine saying, "I made a mistake," what follows in your mind?

"I need to address it"?

Or, "I should not be a pastor"?

What would become possible if you could name the mistake without placing your whole existence on trial?

Find Somewhere to Carry Your Shame

An apology becomes more difficult when you need the person you harmed to reassure you.

You may want to hear that you are still a good pastor, that no real damage was done, or that the other person understands how much pressure you were under. Those desires are human. But they can quietly turn an apology into a request for care.

Bring your fear and shame to someone who can help you remain grounded: a trusted colleague, therapist, spiritual director, or another appropriate support person.

That gives you more room to attend to the person affected by your conduct.

Before the conversation, you might remind yourself:

"I can hear something painful without defending my entire existence."

"I do not need this person to comfort me."

"I remain within grace while taking responsibility."

Movement Two: Name What Is Yours

Begin with the Particular Mistake

You do not need to resolve the whole history of a difficult relationship before acknowledging a clear failure.

Begin with what you did.

Perhaps you interrupted someone and closed the discussion. Perhaps you presented a decision as settled before the appropriate leaders had considered it. Perhaps you shared information that should have remained private, missed a promised call, or used humor that diminished someone.

Stay close to the action.

What did you say or do?

What did it prevent, expose, or make more difficult?

How did your position as pastor affect what happened?

Your intention matters, but it does not erase the effect of your conduct. You may have wanted to keep a meeting moving and still have silenced someone. You may have intended warmth and still have made someone the object of a joke.

Try placing your intention beside the apology rather than in front of it. Your first task is not to establish that you meant well. It is to acknowledge what went wrong.

You may not yet understand the full impact. You can leave room for that without becoming vague:

"I know that I dismissed your concern. I may not yet understand the full effect of that, and I want to hear what I am missing."

Own the Clear Part Without Inventing Agreement

Sometimes you and another person remember events differently.

You do not have to confess to something you do not believe happened. You can still acknowledge what is clear.

You might say:

"We remember parts of that conversation differently. I do know that I raised my voice and ended the conversation abruptly. That was not an appropriate way to respond, and I am sorry."

This leaves room for further understanding without making responsibility wait for complete agreement.

Notice the difference between precision and defensiveness. Precision helps identify what needs repair. Defensiveness uses uncertainty to avoid responsibility altogether.

Find Words You Can Stand Behind

A genuine apology does not have to be eloquent.

It needs to make your responsibility recognizable.

A useful shape is:

- Name what you did.
- Acknowledge its effect.
- Take responsibility and express sorrow.
- Offer a concrete beginning to repair.

For example:

"I interrupted you and dismissed your concern during the meeting. That was disrespectful and prevented the group from considering something important. I am sorry. I should have listened rather than using my position to close the conversation."

You do not need to add:

"But I was under a lot of pressure."

"I am sorry you felt dismissed."

"If anyone was offended, I apologize."

"We all make mistakes."

Each qualification draws attention away from the action you are trying to own.

There may be circumstances worth discussing later. An apology does not require you to deny them. It asks you not to use them to dilute your responsibility.

Sometimes the clearest beginning is simply:

"I dismissed your concern. That was wrong. I am sorry."

Read your words aloud.

Can another person hear what you are taking responsibility for?

Are you acknowledging a particular action, or announcing that you are a terrible person?

Clear responsibility opens a conversation. Self-condemnation can leave the other person wondering whether they must now rescue you.

Movement Three: Begin Appropriate Repair

Let the Repair Answer the Mistake

An apology acknowledges what happened. Repair addresses what can be restored or changed.

The connection matters.

If you silenced someone, repair may restore their opportunity to be heard. If you bypassed consultation, repair may return the decision to the appropriate process. If you failed to follow through, repair may include the promised action and a more dependable way of keeping commitments.

Repair should be meaningful, proportionate, and possible. A small failure may need one direct conversation and a reliable next step. A wider failure may involve several people and take more time.

Imagine yourself in the following situations. Notice how each next step responds to the particular failure.

When You Closed Someone Out of a Meeting

You begin:

"I interrupted you and dismissed your concern during the meeting. That was disrespectful and prevented the group from considering something important. I am sorry. I should have listened rather than using my position to close the conversation."

Then connect the acknowledgment to repair:

"At the next meeting, I would like to acknowledge that mistake publicly and make sure you have an uninterrupted opportunity to share your ideas. Before I do that, I want to ask whether this approach would feel helpful or put you in a position you would rather avoid."

If action is pending, another beginning might be:

"I will email the people who were present, explain that I handled the discussion poorly, and apologize. I will also ask that we hold off on action until we meet again and you have had an opportunity to share your thoughts."

Work with the chair or appropriate governing body to arrange that opportunity and address the decision process. Repairing a failure of consultation should not mean bypassing consultation again.

The point is not simply to announce your regret. It is to restore the participation your behavior prevented.

When You Acted Without Appropriate Consultation

You might say:

"I presented this as a settled decision before bringing it to the people responsible for considering it. I bypassed your role and made meaningful consultation more difficult. I am sorry."

Then:

"I will tell the group that I moved ahead prematurely and that the decision is not final. I will work with the appropriate leaders to return it to the proper process and clarify what should pause while that happens."

Imagine how different this sounds from an apology that leaves the decision effectively irreversible.

If your action has already created consequences, acknowledge those too. Do not promise that everything can be undone when it cannot.

When You Failed to Follow Through

You might say:

"I said I would call after your hospital visit, and I did not. You were expecting contact from me at a difficult time. I am sorry."

Then:

"If you would welcome it, I would like to call tomorrow. I am also changing how I record follow-up commitments so that I am not relying on memory."

A modest promise you keep is more useful than a sweeping assurance that you will never disappoint anyone again.

When You Shared Information You Should Have Protected

You might say:

"I shared information you entrusted to me without your permission. That was a breach of your trust. I am sorry."

Then:

"I want to hear what would be helpful now. I will seek appropriate guidance about addressing the disclosure and, where appropriate, contact those who received the information without repeating it or disclosing it more widely."

Be honest about the limits of repair. You cannot guarantee that information will stop circulating. Do not promise secrecy or a particular remedy before clarifying any relevant obligations.

Where confidentiality, safety, or reporting responsibilities are involved, seek appropriate guidance promptly.

When Your Humor Diminished Someone

You might say:

"I made a joke about you in front of the group. It put you in a position you had not chosen and treated you as material for my humor. I am sorry."

Then:

"With your agreement, I would like to acknowledge that to the same group and make clear that the remark was inappropriate. I will not ask you to laugh it off or reassure everyone that it was harmless."

Repair should not make the person you diminished responsible for relieving your discomfort.

Let the Other Person Help Shape the Repair

Offer a concrete beginning, then make room for what you have not understood.

"What would you want me to understand before we decide what would help?"

"Would this address what happened, or am I missing something important?"

"Would you prefer some time before responding?"

Listen without requiring an immediate declaration that the relationship has been restored.

The person affected may need time. They may identify a consequence you overlooked. They may welcome one part of your proposal and decline another.

Their participation matters. It does not mean you must agree to an unlimited or impossible demand.

You can say:

"I can commit to this part. I need to consider the other request with the appropriate leaders, and I will return to you by Friday."

That is more trustworthy than agreeing out of shame and withdrawing later.

Match the Audience to the Failure

Ask who needs to hear the acknowledgment.

A private failure may need a private apology. A committee failure may need acknowledgment within the committee. Misinformation shared with the congregation may need correction before the congregation.

The audience should serve repair, not display your humility.

Before making a public acknowledgment, consider whether it would expose someone's private experience or pressure them to forgive you publicly. Where privacy and correction are in tension, seek help finding an appropriate way forward.

You can often name your conduct without disclosing someone else's story.

A public apology is not an occasion for the congregation to comfort the pastor. Keep it focused on the failure, its effect, and what will happen next.

Follow Through

After the conversation, briefly confirm what you have agreed to do.

For example:

"I will acknowledge my handling of the discussion at the next meeting. The chair will arrange an opportunity for your concern to be heard before the group considers action. We will check in afterward about anything still unresolved."

Then keep the commitments.

If a promised step becomes impossible, communicate before the deadline passes. Explain what has changed, acknowledge the effect of the delay, and offer a realistic next step.

Explaining a changed commitment is not the same as excusing the original failure. Its purpose is to keep your follow-through trustworthy.

As repair proceeds, ask:

What has been completed?

What remains unresolved?

What changed practice needs to become ordinary?

Repeated apologies cannot substitute for changed behavior. Once responsibility has been clearly acknowledged, dependable action may carry more weight than another expression of regret.

Movement Four: Share the Work of Reconciliation

Stay Present Without Carrying Everything

An apology may not produce immediate warmth.

There may be silence, disappointment, or more to hear. Try not to read every difficult response as a verdict against your whole person. Nor should you assume that continuing pain means the other person is refusing grace.

Something may still need attention.

You can remain present without defending yourself at every turn. You can also pause when you are no longer able to listen constructively:

"I want to continue this conversation carefully. I need a little time to settle so that I can hear you well. Could we return to it tomorrow?"

Give the pause a next step. Otherwise, it may feel like another withdrawal.

If the conversation repeatedly becomes overwhelming or unproductive, it may need another person's help—not another attempt under the same conditions.

Help the Congregation Enter Repair

Some congregations have people who readily help a relationship recover. Others have willing leaders who are unsure what to do next.

You may need to invite an appropriate leader into the process:

"I want to take responsibility for what I did and follow through on repair. I also think we need help making sure concerns are heard, next steps are clear, and the issue is not left to circulate through the grapevine. Would you help us find a constructive way forward?"

For an ordinary mistake, that may mean little more than a conversation, an agreed action, and a brief follow-up.

Where more people are involved, it may help to clarify:

- Who has been affected and needs an opportunity to respond?
- What action would address the failure?
- Who will coordinate the next steps?
- What needs to be communicated, and to whom?
- When will we review what remains unresolved?

You can help initiate this work. You should not have to become its sole facilitator, judge, and source of accountability.

The congregation also has work to do: receive truthful acknowledgment, participate in repair, address gossip, and resist turning a failure into the pastor's permanent identity.

If you have leaders who want to help but feel ill-equipped, point them to the companion resource, After the Apology. It offers support for the congregation's part in extending grace, addressing lingering accusation, and helping the relationship move forward.

This is not a way to recruit people to defend you. It is an invitation for leaders to carry their own responsibility for the health of the pastoral relationship.

Forgiveness cannot be demanded on your timetable. Yet neither should a congregation keep a repaired failure available for endless rehearsal, as though it has become your new name.

Reconciliation requires participation from more than one side.

Notice When the Process Is Stuck

Not every unresolved concern signals an unforgiving congregation.

Before reaching that conclusion, ask whether you have understood the harm, completed the agreed repair, and allowed reasonable room for response. A hurried apology or an unfinished commitment can leave an issue genuinely unresolved.

But some relationships remain stuck even after clear acknowledgment and meaningful repair.

The concern circulates informally but never reaches a setting where it can be addressed. Expectations change whenever you meet them. Leaders remain passive. People divide into camps. Every action you take is interpreted through the original mistake.

At that point, working harder on your apology may not touch what is keeping the relationship from moving forward.

Consider outside help when:

- You cannot reach a workable understanding of what happened or what repair requires.
- Power differences make honest conversation difficult.
- Repeated conversations produce accusation or withdrawal rather than progress.
- Informal circulation and congregational camps sustain the conflict.
- Expectations keep changing, with no clear account of what remains unresolved.
- Leaders are unable or unwilling to guide a constructive process.
- Questions of safety or misconduct require a different form of intervention.
- The strain is significantly affecting your health, family life, or ability to function.

You do not need to wait until departure feels like your only remaining relief.

Ask for help while you still have enough capacity to participate in repair—not only when you have become too exhausted to imagine remaining.

Ask for the Kind of Help You Need

Depending on your setting, you might approach a Committee on Ministry, presbytery executive, denominational leader, or an appropriately qualified facilitator.

You could begin:

"I have acknowledged the mistake and taken these steps toward repair. There are still concerns we have not been able to address constructively. I need help clarifying what remains mine to do, what belongs to the congregation, and what kind of process could help us move forward."

Be specific about the help you are seeking.

Do you need an initial confidential consultation? Someone to help clarify unresolved concerns? A facilitated conversation? Support for leaders who are unsure how to respond?

Before sharing sensitive details, clarify the person's role, confidentiality limits, and responsibilities. Not every outside person is neutral, and not every helpful colleague is equipped to facilitate a strained pastoral relationship.

Seeking help does not mean your apology has failed. It may be the next responsible act.

You are not asking someone to force forgiveness. You are asking for a process in which everyone's responsibility, the work of repair, and the possibility of reconciliation can be taken seriously.

A forthcoming companion resource, When Things Get Stuck: After the Apology: A Facilitator's Guide to Grace, Accountability, and Reconciliation, will offer support for those helping a pastoral relationship move forward.

A Place to Begin

Choose one situation rather than your whole history of mistakes.

Write a few sentences in your own language:

Type in the response areas in the fillable PDF, then save a personal copy to keep and revise your words. Use a PDF reader that supports forms. These responses may contain sensitive information; store and share your copy with care.

What I did:

The effect I recognize:

What is mine to acknowledge:

My apology, without qualification:

A Place to Begin continued

The repair I can offer:

What I need to ask rather than assume:

Who could help us move forward, if needed:

Read what you have written aloud.

Notice where explanation becomes excuse. Notice where clear responsibility becomes self-condemnation. Notice whether the repair answers the actual mistake.

Imagine the other person hearing it.

Would they know what you are acknowledging?

Would they have room to respond?

Would they hear a next step you can realistically keep?

You are not trying to produce a perfect speech. You are finding words and actions you can stand behind.

A Pastoral Word

Making an apology may require a different kind of courage from preaching about confession.

You are no longer speaking about human fallibility in general. You are naming your own, before someone whose response you cannot control.

That vulnerability can be frightening.

You remain within grace.

Your mistake does not have to become your name. Your need to change does not require you to renounce your vocation. Taking responsibility does not mean carrying the whole relationship on your back.

Tell the truth about what is yours. Offer repair that answers what happened. Follow through. Invite others to carry their part. Ask for help before exhaustion closes your imagination.

A genuine apology does not ask you to disappear.

It asks you to become present, truthful, and willing to repair.